This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1906 edition. Excerpt: ...rubbish. Then the owls, hawks, cats and crows can readily see and catch all field mice. Trees which have been completely girdled by mice or rabbits, can often be saved by means of bridge grafting. (See Chapter II.) Partially-girdled trees should be bandaged with cow manure and burlap. An experienced orchardist says that it is an excellent plan to leave the clippings under the trees in the winter when pruning an orchard, so that mice and rabbits will eat such tender twigs instead of gnawing at the tree trunk itself. Dormant buds: Sometimes every fruit bud or blossom on a tree will seem to be killed by cold, and yet--to most folks' surprise--a moderate crop of fruit results. How? By means of the dormant (undeveloped) buds on the trees. When normal buds are killed, the trees often force forward the dormant ones in time partially to supply the deficiency. Good drainage in the orchard is essential to success. Like human beings, fruit trees can not stand wet feet. In the fall a furrow-ditch plowed between tree rows, or wherever needed, may help to insure better drainage conditions during the winter and early spring. See that tile drain outlets do not become obstructed; to keep out small animals, fasten wire netting over each outlet. Fruit buds: These are apt to be more plump than leaf buds, and are therefore usually easily recognized. Slice a fruit bud through the centre, lengthwise; if it is alive, the interior is greenish-yellowish in appearance; if dead, the heart is blackened, even though the remainder of interior looks all right. Frozen buds should be thawed out for several days before making this test. Severe pruning-back is the most effective treatment for badly frozen very young peach trees, etc. Moderate cutting-back is best for less...
