Not illustrated. 1878 edition. Excerpt: ...cover of which, made of ornamental Venetian open work, is hung round with gold coins. The number and size of the gold chains round the neck, and bracelets on the arms, announce the wealth and position of the wearer. But with all this they are not without natural grace, and are free from that awkwardness which often takes refuge in tasteless ornament amongst women whose education just suffices to make them feel the want of it. The next morning I returned the visits of some of these ladies belonging to the well-to-do merchant class; everywhere I found the same lack of comfort, the same appearance of poverty. In most of the large rooms the extreme cold is allowed to penetrate through unglazed windows, closed with a shutter at night, and open doors, and the pan of coals affords but little protection against it. It is inconceivable how these people, accustomed to great heat in summer, can exist in such airy houses with two feet of snow on the ground. The theory that a store of warmth protects for a long time' against cold seems to hold good here. In our northern climates no one could bear such cold indoors. Among all these women I found only one distinguished by mental endowments. Tagu, a girl of fifteen, was the daughter of one of the richest Armenian merchants. She was of middle size, slender, and without the fulness of figure so admired by Asiatics. From under the close fitting tarbush flowed rich chestnut-coloured locks, richly adorned with gazi, Turkish gold coins. Her soft brown eyes, finely formed and shaded by long dark lashes, betrayed the awakened soul which her countrywomen lack; a sweet smile played about her lips, and gave her a child-like naivete, to which a sort of dignity was lent by the finely-arched nose. Her obliging...
